tie-ups with the best fashion institutes around the world and it keeps sending its students and faculty abroad to get international exposure. The institute also makes it a point to involve its students in field trips to crafts centres across the country.

"Recently I was in Surendranagar, Gujarat where I got to interact with local craftsmen and learnt about their craft known as Ikat. It really inspired me. There are many collaborative competitions where many students collaborate to learn new fashion designs and then compete. Besides this, we get a lot of industry exposure where we also get guidance from famous designers," said Namit Sirohi, who studies fashion designing at the institute.

NIFT students recently designed an anti-molestation jacket. It has a small battery in it and emits electricity if someone tries to grab it. "There is also the jewellery which has a battery and can give shock to a chain snatcher," said Narang. The institute started offering a doctoral programme in fashion in 2014 and is planning to have space for incubation where the students will be able to start business.

Few areas of education are as constantly evolving as mass communication. If print journalism dominated a few years ago, now television and web journalism are thriving. Indian Institute of Mass Communication, Delhi, has been at the forefront of media studies. IIMC graduates are so much in demand that most students in the current batch have already been placed.

"The greatest exposure in the institute is that, no matter whichever course you are pursuing, you are free to attend the lectures in other courses in case you find them interesting," said Aditya Laxmanjakki, a student from Telangana who found a job in a business newspaper in Delhi. "I could visit the broadcasting room even though I was a student of English journalism and was not pursuing radio and TV journalism."

Since the institute is run by the ministry of information and broadcasting it gets to work on many public sector and government campaigns. This gives its advertising and public relations students hands-on experience of designing and implementing campaigns. It has also done corporate campaigns.

"We worked on the diabetes campaigns for the health department,
